Executive Summary

Example

We reviewed global benchmarks and designed a new, simple operating model that uses predictable call demand as an organising logic for teams to improve first time resolution

Our operating model is a patch-work of tiny functions

- Our current operation model evolved organically over time in light of system constraints and changes to our business model, and in doing so lost an overarching organising logic

Coordinating operations across multiple sites makes the model more complex

- Managing multiple sites and many suppliers reduces our ability to tightly control operations, contributing to challenges in resolution and advocacy (both down 20% vs. target)

We developed an operating model that uses predictable customer demand as our organising logic

- We designed a simple model that organises into 3 key areas:
 - Acquisition and retention. Focused on sales and saves.
 - General enquiries. Ongoing support for simple queries.
 - Specialist enquiries. Multi-touch journeys like moves.

Next step: mobilise team

- As a next step, we propose to establish a small working group to flush out the detail for each team and their toolset.

Key takeaways: our learnings from international case studies

1

Flanker brands serve different purposes in different growth environments

- Generally, multi-brands are more common in low growth environments
- Dominant purpose differs by geography: Europe to protect brand premium, US to capture untapped segments, Asia to penetrate low-income markets

2

Successful flanker brands are typically operated separately

- Flanker brands are held separate from the main company
- Most second brands are based on an asset-light structures and cost operating models to be nimble, fast and achieve a culture that supports that brand's experience

3

Its not just about low prices

- Positioning for flanker brands relies on:
 - Simplicity, especially in the offer (e.g. no frills).
 - Low prices, pricing is competitive and based single (or few) plan choices.
 - Simple support, few options typically relying mainly on digital channels for fast problem resolution.
